Nice guys do not always come last and bad boys do not always get the girl

by Richard Alleyne, Science Correspondent

Researchers found that, contrary to popular belief, being mild mannered and passive can be attractive to women. In a study they found that more aggressive men do not acquire more women than other men, do not have more children and their wives and children do not survive longer.

The team led by Professor Stephen

Bad boys don't always get the girl in the end claims scientists who discovered that it can pay to be nice.

Beckerman of Pennsylvania State University studied the Waorani of Ecuador, one of the most aggressive communities in the world where it would be expected that mild mannered men would be bullied and walked over.

Researchers interviewed men in 23 settlements, talking to any man old enough to have experienced warfare before the pacification of recent years who was willing to be interviewed about their lives and families.

They found that more passive men had more wives, more children and more offspring that survive in adulthood.

The Waorani had a reputation for killing outsiders and being equally aggressive among one another.

Over five generations 42 per cent of all Waorani population losses were caused by killing one another and another 8 per cent were killed in conflicts with outsiders.

Murder accounted for 54 per cent of male deaths but also 39 per cent of women.

The results, published in the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences, were the opposite of an earlier study of the also warlike Yanomamo of Venezuela, where men who participated in more killings were found to have more wives.
